FULMAIR, s. m. A St. Kilda bird. N. pl. fulmairean.

"The Fulmair is a grey fowl," Martin observes, "about the size of a moor-hen. It has a strong bill, with wide nostrils; as often as it goes to sea, it is a certain sign of a western wind. This fowl, the natives say, sucks its food out of live whales, and eats sorrel; for both these sorts of food are found in its nest. When any one approaches the fulmair, it spouts out of its bill about a quart of pure oil: the natives surprise the fowl, and preserve the oil, and burn it in their lamps. It is good against rheumatic pains and aches in the bones. The inhabitants of the adjacent isles value it as a catholicon for diseases; some take it for a vomit, others for a purge. It has been successfully used against rheumatic pains in Edinburgh and London. In the latter it has been lately used to assuage the swelling of a sprained foot, a cheek swelled with the toothache, and for discussing a hard bite, and proved successful in all the three cases."—Martin's Description of the Western Isles.

G.

G, g. (goibh.) The seventh letter of the Gaelic alphabet.

When this letter is followed by one or more of the vowels, a, o, u, it sounds nearly like g in gap, got, goose; as, gath, take; gort, famine; guth, voice. G, at the end of a word, if preceded by one or more of the vowels, a, o, u, or a liquid, sounds most frequently like k in rook, hook; as, rug, bore; thug, gave. When it is preceded by i, or followed by e or i, it has a mellow sound not unlike g in girl: as, gin, produce; gèire, sharpness. Gh, before a, o, u, or u, have an aspirated power to which there is no correspondent sound in English; but, when followed by e or i, they sound like y in ye; as, ghios, (pronounce ghees), towards. Gh, at the end of words or syllables, are seldom pronounced; as, rich, a king; rioghachd, a kingdom.

G, (contr. for ag), prep. At. This preposition, when prefixed to an infinitive or to most nouns, gives them the force or meaning of the pr. part. 'G is used between two vowels; as, Tha mi 'g òl, I am [at] drinking. Co so 'g aom air luirg? who is this bending over his staff?—Oss. When preceded by a consonant or followed by a vowel, it is written entire; as, Manus ag iarraidh comhraig, Manus wishing for battle.—Oss. Bha anam ag èiridh gun fhiamh, his soul was rising fearlessly.—Oss. Èm. Ag is used not infrequently even though followed by a consonant; as, Gathanna lìobhte ag tearmadh, polished darts descending.—Old Poem. Between two consonants the g is dropped; as, Turlach 'a caoidh a chloinne, Turlach bewailing his children.—Oss.

G, (for aig), comp. pron. At whom or which; to whom or which. 'G am bheil an sealladh ard, who have a lofty look; literally, to whom is the look that is lofty.—Sm.

G, (for gu), prep. To. Còilte g' a cheann, covered up to his head.—Oss. Fing.

G, (for aig a). G am bheil beachd air gach ni, who knowest every thing.—Turn.

G, G, (for gu a). To him or her; to his or her; to it. G a thigh, to his house; g a thigh, to her house. G a sgriobadh fein, to scratch himself.—Stew. Job.

G, for gath, s. m. (Arm. gwayw.) A sting, spear, dart, javelin; a ray or beam. G a nathrach, an adder's sting; ga gealach, a moonbeam; ga grèine, a sunbeam; also, one of the names of Fingal's banner. G a grèine mhic Cumhail ri crann, put the banner of Fingal to its staff.—Old Poem.

G, adv. Though. See G.R.D.

† G, adv. (Ir. ga.) Where? in what place? Now written ca; as, cà nis am bheil do ghath? where now is thy sting?—Sm.

GABHADH-BHÉIL, s. f. A Druidical trial by the ordeal of fire; literally, the jeopardy of Bel, the god of the Druids; hence it comes to denote any kind of danger, emergency, hazardous situation; hazard of such a nature that one's escape is a miracle.

The Druids used the ordeal of fire in cases where the innocence of an accused person could not be ascertained by evidence. They obliged that person to walk barefooted on the hot ashes and embers of the Sumb-theine, or fire of peace. If they had any ground to believe him innocent, yet, if the multitude were impressed with an opinion of his guilt, they, to make a shew of rigour and impartiality, passed sentence of punishment on him; but, with the craftiness of their character, and the ever-scheming trickery of their profession, they privately provided him with an ointment well known among the ancients, (see Ovid, book ii. fable 1, and Servius, on line 78 of the eleventh Æneid.) and among modern jugglers, by an application of which to his feet and hands, he could go through the ordeal uninjured, and thus establish his innocence. Dr. Smith thinks it probable that Paul the Apostle, who might have seen this trial among the nations which he travelled through, alludes to it in 1 Cor. iii. 15.

This name, in its most common acceptation, is applicable to those only who inhabit the north and north-western parts of Scotland, including the Hebrides; and to them the following remarks are meant to apply:—

The Gael are confessedly the unmixed and unconquered posterity of the Celts, who first peopled Britain from the opposite shores of Gaul, and who left monuments of their language in the names of streams, rivers, mountains, and districts, all over England. The Caledonians of ancient authors were Gael; but, of old, they occupied a much wider tract of country than in aftertimes. Caledonia, according to Tacitus, Dio, and Solinus, comprehended all that country to the north of the Firths of Forth and Clyde; from the southern parts of which the Gael were compelled to retire, to make room for hordes of ferocious incursors from the south,—the Cimbrî first, and latterly the Belgæ. The Lowlands of Scotland are now inhabited by a race of men as distinct from the Gael as a difference of language, ancestry, and manners, can render them. Though every Scottish Gael, therefore, be a Caledonian, every Caledonian is not a Gael.

The testimony of ancient authors, the poetry of the Gael, the remains of their buildings, their traditional records, and, above all, the smoothness and harmony of their language above every other branch of the Celtic tongue, present, when considered in the whole, an incontrovertible argument that they were, once on a time, not merely more cultivated than their neighbours, but that they passed through ages of very high civilization and refinement.

The Gael lived under a regular government, modelled and perfected by their Druids, until the accession of Kenneth Mac Alpin, towards the middle of the ninth century. That monarch, after his conquest of the Picts, transferred his seat of government amongst them; and from that period may be dated the anarchy, the confusion and rapine, which so speedily overspread their country. Adventurous and aspiring individuals began to gather bands of retainers,—chieftaincy raised its head, and established its strength on the ruins of legitimate power,—jealousy, feud, and clanish animosity were the consequent and inseparable evils of this altered state; and, in a short time, they wrought a speedy but thorough revolution in their character. The refined feelings, so conspicuous in the poems of Ossian and his contemporary poets, disappeared from amongst them,—methodical warfare and reflecting bravery gave ground,—and headlong daring came instead thereof; and of all the good qualities of their fathers, those only of hospitality, faithfulness, and courage remained, and have continued, amid all the vicissitudes of their history, without change and without blench.

The Gael continued under a feudal government until the memorable disturbances in the last century, when they were taught, by a dearly bought experience, that their pathless fastnesses could present no hiding-place from insulted royalty, and that there was an arm in the land still stronger than a chieftain's power.

The modern Gael is naturally an indolent and unindustrious being; yet, when there is occasion for activity and exertion, he is not often to be paralleled. He is modest and unassuming. His courtesy and good breeding are unstudied and becoming; and no feeling of inferiority betrays him into distraction or awkwardness of manner. Shrewd, inquisitive, and intelligent, he has his faculties collected and at his command. He is sensible of kindness, and deeply susceptible of gratitude; but, with all, he is superstitious, haughty, passionate, and vindictive.

A person who, in the year 1597, wrote an account of the Gael, describes them as follows:—"They settle their flesh in tripe, or in the skine of the beast, filling the same full of water. Now and then, in hunting, they straine out the blood, and cate the flesh raw: their drink is broth of sodden flesh: they love very well the drake made of weye."

"They delight in marled clothes, specially that have long stripes of sundry colours. They love chiefly purple and blue. Their predecessors used short mantles, or playds of divers colours, sundry wayes divided; and, amongst some, the same custom is observed to this day; but, for the most part, now they are brown, near to the colour of the hadder, to the effect, when they lye amongst the hadder, the bright colour of their playdes may not bewray them; with the which, rather coloured than clad, they suffer the most cruel tempests that blowe in the open field, in such sort, that vnder a wythe of snow they sleep sound. In their houses also they lye upon the ground, laying betwixt them and it brakens and hadder, the rootes thereof down, and the top vp, so prettily layde together, that they are soft as feather beds, and much more wholesome; for the tops are dry of nature, whereby it dries the weakè humours, and restores againe the strength of the sinews troubled before; and that so evidently, that they who at evening go to rest sore and weary, rise in the morning whole and able."

"If they travel to another countrie, they reject feather beds and bedding of their hoste. They wrappe themselves in their own playds, so taking their rest, careful lest that barbarous delicacie (as they terme it) corrupt their natural hardnesse."

"They fight with broad swords and axes. In place of a drum they vse a bagpipe. They delight much in musike, but chiefly in harps and clarsichoes of their own fashion. The strings of the clarsichoes are of brasse wire, and the strings of the harps of sinews, which strings they strike either with their nayles growing long, or else with an instrument appointed for that vse. They take great pleasure to decke their harps and clarsichoes with silver and precious stones; and poor ones, that cannot attayne heretunto, decke them with chrystall. THEY SING VERSES PRETTILY COMPOUND, CONTAINING, FOR THE MOST PART, PRAISES OF VALIANT MEN. There is not almost any other argument whereof their rhymes entertain. They speak the ancient French language (Celtic), altered a little."

Dr. Martin, in describing the dress of the Hebrideans of his time, has the following remarks:—"The first habit worn by persons of distinction in the islands, was the lein-croich, or saffron shirt. The ordinary number of ells used to make this robe was twenty-four; it was the upper garb, reaching below the knees, and was tied with a belt round the middle; but the Islanders have laid it aside about a hundred years ago.

"They now generally use coat, waist, and breeches, as elsewhere; and on their heads wear bonnets made of thick cloth, some blue, some black, and some grey.

"Many of the people wear trous; some have them very fine, woven of stockings; some are made of cloth; some are coloured, and others striped. The latter are as well shaped as the former, lying close to the body, from the middle downwards, and tied round with a belt above the haunches.

"There is a square piece of cloth which hangs down before. The measure for shaping the trous is a stick of wood, whose length is a cubit, and that divided into the length of a finger and half a finger, so that it requires more skill to make it than the ordinary habit.

"The shoes anciently worn were a piece of the hide of a deer, cow, or horse, with the hair on, being tied behind and before with a piece of leather. The generality now wear shoes having one thin sole only, and shaped after the right and left foot, so that what is for one foot will not serve the other.

“But persons of distinction wear the garb in fashion in the south of Scotland.

“The plad, worn only by the men, is made of fine hose, the threads as fine as can be made of the kind: it consists of divers colours, and there is a great deal of ingenuity required in sorting the colours, so as to be agreeable to the nicest fancy. For this reason, the women are at great pains, first to give an exact pattern of the plad upon a piece of wood, having the number of every thread of the stripe on it. The length of it is commonly seven double ells. The one end hangs by the middle over the left arm; the other, going round the body, hangs by the end over the left arm also; the right hand above it is to be at liberty to do any thing upon occasion. Every icle differs from each other in the fancy of making plads, as to the stripes, in breadth and colours. This humour is different through the main land of the Highlands, in so far that they who have seen those places, are able, at the first view of a man's plad, to guess the place of his residence.

“When they travel on foot, the plad is tied on the breast with a bodkin of bone or wood, (just as the spina of the Romans, according to the description of C. Tacitus); the plad is tied round the middle with a leather belt; it is plaited from the belt to the knee very nicely: this dress, for footmen, is found much easier and lighter than breeches or trousers.

“The ancient dress wore by the women, and which is yet wore by some of the vulgar, called arisd (arrasaid), is a white plad, having a few small stripes of black, blue, and red; it reached from the neck to the heels, and was tied before on the breast with a buckle of silver or brass, according to the quality of the person. I have seen some of the former of an hundred marks value: it was as broad as any ordinary pewter plate; the whole curiously engraven with various animals, &c. There was a lesser buckle, which was wore in the middle of the larger, and above two ounces weight: it had in the centre a large piece of crystal, or some fine stone, and this was set all round with several finer stones of a lesser size.

“The plad, being plaited all round, was tied with a belt below the breast; the belt was of leather, and several pieces of silver intermixed with the leather, like a chain. The lower end of the belt was a piece of plate, about eight inches long and three in breadth, curiously engraven, the end of which was curiously adorned with fine stones, or pieces of red coral. They wore sleeves of scarlet cloth, closed at the end as men's vests, with gold lace round 'em, having plate buttons set with fine stones. The head-dress was a fine kerchief of linen strait about the head, hanging down the back taper-wise: a large lock of hair hangs down their cheeks above their breast, the lower end tied with a knot of ribands.”

As the causes no longer exist which separated the Gael from the observation and fellowship of their neighbours, so their character, as a distinct people, is becoming yearly less and less marked. A chieftain has no longer occasion for crowds of retainers, because he is now safe without the protection of his clan. Oppression, too, tames their spirit; disgust drives them from their homes; enterprise carries them into society, and throughout the world; yet it is questionable, if, in their many multitudes of migrators, there could ever be found one who became so thoroughly deformed by a change of country or of circumstances, as to prefer, in his heart, the fairest climes and the politest people, to the rocky land of his nativity, and the simple society of his early years.

 † GARD, s. m. A garden; a fenced place; a guard.
 Gard is a very ancient, probably a primeval, term, and is seen in most of the languages of ancient and modern times. *Heb. Chabl. Syr. gert, to enclose. Arab. and Old Pers. gherd, a town. Modern Pers. gard, a town. Rus. Schow. Old Germ. gard. Russ. gorod, gorad, and grod. Hence Constantinople, in the Old Russ, is Tsargrad or Tsargorad. Gard means a fenced place or an enclosure, in the Phœnician, Punic, Parthic, and Samaritan tongues. From signifying an enclosure, it came in course of time to denote a fortified city. It has this meaning in the Old Persic or Pahlavi. From gard comes Kerta, the name of a city in Armenia, meaning an enclosed or fortified place. Kerta tridus uero Aquasium, Kerta, a city of the Armenians.—Hyppolitus. Synonymous with the Celtic gard or gard was the Syrian Kerta or Karta; whence the Latin Carthago, and, as it is more correctly written, the Punic Karthada (Carthago), the fortified place.—See Cellarius De Geographia, lib. iii. cap. 6.
 From gard or gort are derived all the names of towns ending in certa, cart, gard, or grad; as, Tigranicerta, Carcathicerta, Artasigarta, in Armenia; Belgrad, Stutgard, Stargard, &c.
 From gard, a fenced place, come the modern terms for a garden, as well as the word garden itself. Teut. gaerd. Germ. gard. Fr. jardin. Span. giardin. It. giardino. Don gaart. W. Arm. gard. Ir. garda. Scotch. yard. Hence also the English word guard.

This word is synonymous with gath-builg and crasach dearg. Tacitus, De Mor. Germ., observes, that such weapons were used by the Persians, a Belgic nation of German extraction. In one of Ossian's poems (Fingal), Cuchullin is described as having slain his friend Feardath, a young Caledonian warrior, with a spear heated into a flame by the wind, i. e. by the armourer's fire. This weapon, according to some, must have been the jaculum ferre-factum mentioned by Caesar, and the catcia [gath-teth pronounced ga-ti] of Virgil:

"Tutonicis ritu soliti torquere calcus."

The clava ambusta of Ammianus, lib. xxi., seem to have been the same as the Caledonian gath-teth:—"Barbari, ingentes clavas in nostros conjicientes ambustas, cornu perimpunt." This appears to be a simpler and better illustration of the nature of the catcia than that of Avenarius, who asserts that it was an engine for throwing stones. Isidorus comes nearer the truth: he says (without making any mention of its being heated) that it was a weapon which, owing to its weight, could not be thrown to a great distance, but was very destructive.

N. pl. glóineachan, glasses. Cinnidh uisge na glóineachan cruaidh, water shall turn into glass.*—Macdon.

The word gloine seems to be glaoth-théine, glued by fire. From the composition of this vocable, Dr. Smith infers, with much reason, that the Druids were no strangers to the making of glass; the knowledge of which art, he observes, they might have obtained from the first inventors, the Phœnicians. Dr. Smith presumes further, that the Druids were so perfect in the art, and so well acquainted with the properties of glass, as to apply it, with the most eminent success, to the purposes of astronomy. Mr. Huddleston, the very ingenious editor of "Toland's History of the Druids," touching this opinion, is somewhat sarcastic on Smith. He remarks that the telescopic hypothesis rests on a mistaken meaning of a quotation from Hecateus, who says, that the Boreada bring the moon very near them; and that the Boreada, even granting they were Druids, only asserted a prerogative which was common to all magicians, namely, "to bring down the moon;" and, consequently, that the allusion is made to incantation, and not to telescopes. All this does not in the least repel the opinion of Dr. S., which derives additional strength from Diodorus Siculus, who makes mention of an Hyperborean island, from which the moon was to be seen, apparently at a small distance from the earth, and exhibiting several inequalities and eminences on its surface. This is not the language of incantation, but a just description of the moon as seen through glasses of very considerable power.

GLOINE NAN DRUIDH. The Druids' glass, or the Druids' egg; by the Lowland Scots called adderstones.

This amulet was in high esteem among the Druids. It was one of their distinguishing badges, and was accounted to possess the most extraordinary virtues. There is a passage in Pliny's Natural History, book xix., minutely describing the nature and properties of this amulet. The following is a translation of it:—"There is a sort of egg in great repute among the Gauls, of which the Greek writers have made no mention. A vast number of serpents are twisted together in summer, and coiled up in an artificial knot by their saliva and slime; and this is called the serpent's egg. The Druids say that it is tossed in the air with hissing, and must be caught in a cloak before it touch the earth. The person who thus intercepts it, flies on horseback; for the serpents pursue him until prevented by intervening water. This egg, though bound in gold, will swim against the stream. And as the magi are cunning to conceal their frauds, they give out that this egg must be obtained at a certain age of the moon. I have seen that egg as large and round as a common-sized apple, in a chequered cartilaginous cover, and worn by the Druids. It is wonderfully extolled for gaining law-suits, and access to kings. It is a badge which is worn with such ostentation, that I knew a Roman knight, a Vocontian, who was slain by the stupid emperor Claudius, merely because he wore it in his breast when a law-suit was pending."

My subscribers are referred to Huddleston's edition of Toland, for some very ingenious conjectures on the subject of this enigmatical account of the Druids' egg.

The amulets of glass and stone, which are still preserved and used with implicit faith in many parts of the Highlands, and are conveyed, for the cure of diseases, to a great distance, seem to have their origin in this bauble of ancient priestcraft.

GRADAN, ain, s. m., from grad. (Ir. id.) Parched corn. Gràn gradain, parched grains of corn.—Stew. Sam.

Gradan was corn or meal prepared after the ancient custom of the Gael. A woman sitting down, took a handful of corn, and holding it in her left hand by the stalks, she set fire to the ears, which were at once in a flame. In her right hand she held a stick, with which she dexterously beat the grain at the very instant when the husks were quite burnt. By this simple process, which is still followed in remote parts of the Highlands, corn may be cut down, dressed, winnowed, dried, ground, and baked, within half an hour. In separating the meal from the husks, instead of sieves they made use of a sheep's skin stretched round a hoop, minutely perforated by a small hot iron. The bread which is thus made is considered very salubrious, and is extremely pleasant to the palate of a Highlander. Prepared in the same simple manner was the parched corn of holy writ, such as that which is mentioned in the book of Ruth.

GRIANTACHD, s. f. A barren moor through which the river Spey runs. It is also called Slabh Ghriannas, that is, the heath of Grannius, or of the Sun.

Here are seen many Druidical circles of stone; and as the sun was an object of worship among the ancient Gael, as appears from an inscription dug out of the ruins of the Roman prætorium between the firths of Forth and Clyde, alluded to by Dr. John Macpherson in his Dissertations, it is presumable that the meaning here given is correct. Some say that the heath received its name from the clan Grant, who inhabit that country. The antiquarian already mentioned thinks it more probable that the Grants, in Gaelic called Granntaich, had their name from the country, and not from a pretended Le Grand, as the genealogists of the tribe affirm.

H.

H, (uath, the white-thorn tree.) The eighth letter of the Gaelic alphabet. It is used in the Gaelic, not properly as a letter, but as an aspiration. When it is prefixed to a word beginning with a vowel, it has the same degree of aspiration with h in hall, hurt; as, na h-oidhean, the maids; na h-oidheche, of the night. H is also required between the negative ni and the following word, if it begin with a vowel; as, ni h-è, not he; ni h-eadh, no; ni h-iaid, not they; ni h-eudar, must not. It is also used in the beginning of various interjections; as, haha! an interjection of mirth; hoio! haibh! interjections used in calling aloud to a person. Hut! hud! tut! psaw! Ho, ho! an interjection of defiance, and sometimes of disappointment. H-ugad, to thee; take care; h-ugam, to me; h-ugaibh, to you;—said to persons when they are requested to take immediate care of their persons, as from a blow, or any impending danger. These words are also written respectively, chugad, chugam, chugaibh.

I.

I, (iogh.) The ninth letter of the Gaelic alphabet. The Gael, differing from their brother Celts in Brittany and Cornwall, never use i as a consonant in the shape of j. In this respect the Gaelic resembles the Greek and the ancient Latin, in which j, the consonant form of i, was never used as a distinct character. The Gaelic i has two sounds: (1.) both long and short, like ee in decum; as, sin, stretch; cir, comb: short, like ee in feet; as, bith, existence; sir, seek. (2.) Short and obscure, like i in miss; as, is, am, art, is, are.

I, s. pron. (Corn. hi. Arm. hi. Lat. ea.) She, her. Bhuail si i, she struck her; ise, emphatic form of i, she, her, in contradistinction to any other female; i fein, herself.

I, s. An island.

Hind. ey. Hcb. i or ai. Island. ey. Du. ey. Barbarous
Lat. eia. Sax. + eia. Germ. + ei. Swed. + oe. Ir. i.

I Cholum chille, Iona, or St. Columba's Isle, in the Hebrides, was called I by way of eminence. The far-famed monastery of this island, it is well known, was founded about the middle of the sixth century by St. Colum, or Columba, an Irish priest, who in a fit of displeasure had left his native country, after having involved it in three different wars. According to Keating and Adamnan, he was of very high birth, but the cowl and tonsure presented to his eccentric mind charms superior to those of civil distinctions. He was held in high estimation by the princes of Britain and of foreign countries, who often applied to him for deciding their controversies. A curious circumstance related of him is, that he had a rooted aversion to cows, and would not suffer one to be seen within sight of his sacred tenements. "Far am bi bo," he was wont to say, "bithidh bean, is far am bi bean bithidh mallachadh;" where there is a cow there is a woman, and where there is a woman there is swearing. This sentiment has, ever since, continued in the Gaelic language.

The undisputed sacredness of the monastery was, no doubt, one reason why the remains of so many kings of various nations were crowded to this distant and lonely island: the following very ancient prophecy may have been another:—

Seachd bliadhna roimh 'n bhràth,
Thig muir thair Eirinn re aon tràth,
Is thair Ìa ghuir ghlaish;
Ach snannaidh I Cholum clàraich.

A literal Translation.

Seven years before the world's end
The sea shall come over Eirinn at one tide,
And over green grassy Ìsla;
But I Colm shall flood upon the flood.

Saint Columba, of whom it is handed down that he uttered his discourses in verse to suit the taste of the people, uttered the following prediction in his last discourse to his disciples. Every person who has read Dr. Johnson's Tour to the Hebrides, cannot fail remarking the resemblance between the latter part of this prophecy, and the striking thoughts on the changes of human affairs in the illustrious tourist's description of Iona.

An I mo chridhe, I mo ghraidh,
An àite guth mànaich bithidh geum ba;

Ach mun tig an saoghal gu crìch
Bithidh I mar a bha.

Literal Translation.

In the isle of my heart, the isle of my love,
Instead of a monk's voice, there shall be the lowing of cattle;
But, ere the world comes to an end,
Iona shall flourish as before.

Ir. iarla. W. iarll. Corn. arluth. Old Dan. according to Wormius, iarll, baron. Swed. iarler. Old Sax. eorl.
Iar-fhlath (pronounced iurly) is literally a secondary noble or chief; and hence evidently is derived the word earl, which is certainly not of Danish origin, as Dr. Macpherson would have it. Among the northern nations the dignity of iar-fhlath was next to that of king, and it appears to have been in existence in the time of the Finghians. Iar-fhlath Mùthan mor nan long, the great earl of maritime Muthan.—Fingalian Poem.

- Arm. infern. Corn. ifarn. Ir. ifearn. W. yfern.*
- Ifirn* literally means the isle of the cold land, or clime, being a contracted form of i-fuar-shuin. The Celtic hell was a cold dark region, abounding in venomous reptiles and wild beasts, especially wolves. The Scotch Celts still retain the name, though well aware that cold forms no part of infernal punishment.
- The following lines, quoted by Dr. Smith from an ancient Gaelic MS., illustrate the notions which our Celtic forefathers had of a place of punishment after death:—
- " 'S mairg a roghnuicheas Ifrinn fhuar,
'S gur i uaimh nan driobhunn gear,
Is beag orm Ifrinn fhuar fhliuch,
Aite bith-bhuan is searbh deoch."

- IUTHAIR, gen. sing. of iuthar.

IUTHAR, air, s. f. A yew-tree; yew. Iuthar beinne, juniper; iuthar talnainn, juniper.

Jaing is not correct when, in attacking the genuineness of the poems of Ossian, he asserts that the yew, so often mentioned in these works, is not a native plant of Scotland; for there are various places named after the yew, and have been so from time immemorial; as, Gleniur, i. e. Glenn-iuthair, or the glen of yews; Dun-iur, i. e. Dun-iuthair, or the mount of yews. These names, and many others, prove that the yew is indigenous, and that it was once abundant in the Highlands.

IUTHARACH, a. Made of yew; abounding in yew.

IUTHARACH, aich, s. f. A place where yews grow.

L.

L, l, luis, the quicken tree; for the Gael named their letters after natural objects and trees, when the names began with suitable initials. When it is preceded by itself, or by any other consonant, and followed by a broad vowel, as, a, o, u, it has a broad lingual sound, to which there is none like in the English language; as, làn, full; lom, bare; lus, an herb. When l is immediately followed by a short vowel, e or i, it is pronounced like the Italian gl in gle or gli; as, litir, a letter; lìnn, an age. Yet, in the case of nouns beginning with l, if the masc. poss. pron. go before, l is pronounced as in English; as, a litir, his letter; which differs essentially in sound from a litir, her letter. With regard to verbs beginning with l, the preterite is pronounced as in English; and in most other situations it is pronounced as ll.

LÀ, gen. la, s. m. (Ir. id.) A day; the space from evening to evening; one day; on a certain day; daylight. N. pl. lài, days. An là an diugh, to-day, this day.—Stew. Gen. Là a ghabh i anns an fhonn, one day [on a certain day] she introduced into her song.—Oss. Fing. Gu la, till daylight; là briagh, a fine day; là math, a good day; là fhluich, a wet day; là gailbheach, a stormy day; là seachdain, a week day; là domhnuich, a Sunday; an ath là, the second day, the following day.—Stew. Acts. Là càisge, Easter; là cuinguis, Whitsunday; là fèill, a feast-day, a fair-day, a festival; a holiday; Là Mhuir, Lady-day; là bealtuinn, May-day; là na bliadhna ùr, New-Year's-day; là buain an lin, Nevermas, Græce Calende. Là luain, a Monday; also, a day that shall never arrive, or a day to which the moon gives light. Do là, by day; làithean fèill, days of folly; là ceud fhèill Mhuire, Purification-day. Written also làth and lò.

According to Shaw, this vocable is met with in old manuscripts, having the same meaning with the modern Gaelic le; which see.

Hence the Greek λεστργων (lestrigoi), pirates; and also λεστργων, the Lestrigons, whom the poets of antiquity describe as cannibals, but who were in fact barbarous and rapacious pirates, infesting the Sicilian seas. Being born and brought up on board their vessels, they were suitably denominated λεστργων (lestrigones), i. e. lestar-gin, the race of ships. Hence it is evident that the Celtic language was once spoken in Greece, Italy, and Sicily.—See also Malcolm's Antiquities.

There is a stone, or rather a crystal, called leug, which was in high request among the Gaël during the ages of Popish superstition. Water poured upon it became straightway impregnated with peculiar medical virtues, which did not, however, extend beyond cattle. These stones are still in preservation, and in repute among the lower orders of Highlanders.

† LIA-FAILE, s. f. The stone called also clach na cineamhuinn (the fatal stone), on which the Scotch kings were wont to be crowned, now in Westminster Abbey.

The lia fail, or, as some call it, the liag fail, or leug fail, was probably an invention of the Druids. It was the fatal chair on which the supreme kings of Ireland were inaugurated in the days of Druidism. From Ireland it was conveyed to Dunstaffnage in Scotland; thence, about the year 842, to Scone, by Kenneth II.; and, lastly, in 1300, by Edward to Westminster, where it still remains. How the lia fail came to Scotland, whether by theft, fraud, or violence, is not ascertained. It possessed extraordinary virtues till the time of our Saviour's birth. When the rightful candidate sat on it, it emitted a strange noise, and appeared otherwise agitated in a surprising manner. All this was, no doubt, owing to the Druids, by whose clever jugglery the minds of men were then influenced and guided. It is not unlikely, then, that the lia fail was lent to the Caledonians by their unsuspecting and generous brethren of Erin, in order to decide some question of royal right or legitimacy,—that the Caledonians detained it contrary to promise and justice,—and that the Irish thought it not worth the recovering, since its virtues had vanished at the commencement of the Christian era, or rather, perhaps, on the extinction of the Druidical order. Some time after its arrival in Scotland, a superstitious belief became attached to it,—that wherever the stone should be found, some one of the race should reign. This persuasion is not so old as the times of Druidism.—I speak with deference where Toland differs in opinion. This able antiquarian has recorded an Irish rhyme, a "Druidical Oracle" respecting this most ancient monument, contained in the following words:—

Cioniodh scuit saor an fine,
Man ba breg an Faisdine.
Mar a bh' fhuighid an lia-fail,
Dhigid fhaithreas do ghlabail.

Translated into Latin by Hector Boethius.

Ne fallat fatum, Scoti, quocunque locatum
Invenient lapidem hunc, regnare tenentur ibidem.

English Translation.

Except old saws do feign,
And wizards' wits be blind,
The Scots in place must reign,
Where they this stone shall find.

Another.

Consider, Scot, where'er you find this stone,
If fates fail not, there fixed must be your throne.

LUATHADH, aith, s. m. Hastening; moving.

LUATHADH, aith, s. m. A fulling or cleansing of cloth. Muileann luathaidh, a fulling-mill.

Where fulling mills are at a great distance, the waulking or fulling of cloth is performed by females in the following manner:—Six or eight (I have seen fourteen) take their stations, in an equal manner, on each side of a long frame of wattled work, or sometimes of a board ribbed longitudinally, and placed on the ground. Thereon is laid the wetted blanket or cloth which is to undergo the process of waulking. The women then kneel, and, with their arms, rub it firmly against the frame, with all their strength; singing loudly, at the same time, some mountain melody. When their arms grow tired, they very naturally have recourse to their legs; then, sitting upon the ground, and tucking their petticoats up to their knees, the cloth is forthwith under a course of more vigorous friction than before. As the work grows warm, the song grows louder and louder, even to a very yell; and at this stage of the process, a stranger coming unexpectedly upon them, and who had never heard of such a substitute for a fulling-mill, might well take them for the weird sisters engaged in some terrible incantation.

LUCHAIDH-FHAIRGE, s. pl. Mother Cary's chickens; small black birds with crooked bills and webbed feet, resembling swallows in size, and found in vast numbers in the isle of Staffa, and throughout the Hebrides.

Shaw observes of these sea-fowls, that they go into holes like mice, and that when they are taken, a quantity of yellow oil falls from their bills. It has been remarked of them that they hatch their eggs by sitting on the ground about six inches from them, and, turning their heads towards them, make a cooing noise, called gur le gùg, 'hatch with a song,' day and night till the eggs are hatched. They are dreaded by man, who presage an approaching storm from their appearance. They collect during a tempest, and are seen sweeping with incredible swiftness along the wake of a ship. They are common throughout the ocean; and are the same with the κεφάλαια, or cephallia, of the ancient seamen.—See PLINY, x. 30.

MUILEANN BRÀDH, s. m. A hand-mill or quern.

The bràdh or quern was once the only mill for corn-grinding used in the Highlands of Scotland. It is still in use among the northern nations of Europe, and in many parts of Asia. This rude instrument is composed of two stones of granite. The undermost stone is about two feet in diameter, and commonly hollowed to the depth of six inches. This hollow is of equal depth and diameter. Within this is placed, horizontally, a smooth round flag about four inches thick, and so fitted to the cavity, that it can just revolve with ease. Through the centre of this revolving flag there is bored a hole for conveying the grain. In the lower stone, in the centre of its cavity, there is fixed a wooden pin on which the upper stone is placed in such exact equiponderance, that, though there be some friction from their contact, a little force applied will make the upper flag revolve for several times, when there is no grain underneath.

On the surface of the upper flag, and near the edge, are two or three holes, just deep enough to hold in its place the stick by which it is turned round. The working of this mill was left to the women; two of whom, when the corn was properly dried (see GRADAN), sat squatting on the ground, with the bràdh betwixt them, and, singing loudly some mountain-melody, performed their work, the one turning round the upper flag with the thivel placed in one of the holes, and the other dropping the corn in through the large hole. This rude mill was common among the Celtic nations, from the earliest periods of their history of which we have any account that can be relied on; and, without question, it is to this simple instrument that we are to look for an explanation of our Saviour's prophecy of "two women grinding at a mill." In corroboration of this remark we have the authority of Dr. Clarke, who saw one worked in Nazareth, the earliest residence of Jesus Christ. "Two women," he observes, "seated on the ground opposite to each other, held between them two round flat stones, such as are seen in Lapland, and such as are in Scotland called querns. * * * In the centre of the upper stone was a cavity for pouring in the corn; and by the side of this an upright wooden handle for moving the stone. As the operation began, one of the women, with her right hand, pushed this handle to the woman opposite, who again sent it to her companion; thus communicating a rotatory and very rapid motion to the upper stone; their left hands being all the while employed in supplying fresh corn, as fast as the bran and flour fell from the sides of the machine."

The law of Scotland attempted in vain to discourage the use of the bràdh. So far back as the reign of Alexander III., in the year 1284, it was enacted: "That na man shall presume to grind quheit, maisloch, or rye, with hand mylnes, except he be compelled by storm, and be in lack of mylnes quhill should grind the samen. And, in this case, if a man grinds at hand-mylnes, he shall gif the thretein measure as multer; and gif any man contraveins this our prohibition, he shall tyne his hand-mylnes perpetuallie."

N.

N, (nuin, the ash.) The twelfth letter of the Gaelic alphabet.

It has various sounds: (1.) N, when immediately preceded by i, or when i is the last vowel of the same syllable, often sounds exactly as the French n in guigne, or the Italian n in regno; as, linn, an age; càirn, cairns; nighean, a daughter; uinneag, a window. (2.) When n is in the beginning of a verb in the imperative mood, and followed by a broad vowel, as nochd, shew; or at the beginning of a masculine adjective, and followed by a broad vowel, as, naomh, holy; nuadh, new; it has no sound similar to it in English, but it accords exactly with the first n in the French non, no. The same remarks apply to the reduplicated nn. (3.) N, at the beginning of a feminine adjective, and followed by a long vowel; or in the preterites of verbs, whether aspirated or not, and followed by a long vowel; or in the end of words, and preceded by a long vowel, sounds as n in the English words nor, not; naomh, holy; naisg, squeezed; shnàg, creeped; làn, full. (4.) N, whether simple or aspirated, if followed by a short vowel, sounds like n in seen, neat; in the preterite, and in certain other tenses, as, high, washed; shniomh, spun; in the middle of words, as, sinidh, shall stretch; and in the end of words, as, min, meal; coin, dogs. Lastly; the monosyllable an, when the next word begins with c or g, sounds like ng; as, an cù, the dog; an gial, the cheek.

N, followed by a hyphen [n-], is introduced between the poss. pron. ar, our, and the following word, when it begins with a vowel; as, ar n-aithrichean, our fathers.—Sm. Nar n-dìge, in our youth.—Id.

'N, (for an), def. art. The. 'N Tì tha glic, the Being who is wise.—Sm. Dh'ìmhich 'n dreach àillidh, the beautiful vision vanished.—Orr.

'N, d. sing. and pl. of the def. art. an. To the.

'N, (for an), a particle which precedes the future tenses of verbs beginning with a dental. 'N dean nì e? shall I do it?

'N, prep. (for ann.) In. 'N tigh caol gun leus, in the narrow dark dwelling.—Oss. Fing. 'N cridhe 'n daoil, in the heart of the wicked.—Sm.

'N, poss. pron. (for an.) Their. Fo 'n sàil, under their heels.—Oss. Fing.

A succession of an order of literati named ollamh, existed in Mull from time immemorial, until after the middle of the last century. Their writings were all in Gaelic, to the amount of a large chestful. Dr. Smith says that the remains of this treasure were brought as a literary curiosity to the library of the Duke of Chandos, and perished in the wreck of that nobleman's fortune. The last of the order was the famous old Doctor John Breton, whose memory is preserved in the following words, inscribed on his tombstone in Iona:—

Hic jacet Johannis Betonius Mac-
Lencorum familiar, Medicus, qui mortuus est 19 Novembris, 1657,
Æt. 63. Donaldus Betonius fecit 1674.
Ecce cadit jaculo victicis mortis iniquæ
Qui alios solverat ipse mali.

P.

P, p. (beith-bhog.) The fourteenth letter of the Gaelic alphabet. It sounds like p in English; and when aspirated, that is, when it immediately precedes the letter h, it sounds like f in fool, or ph in pharmacy. It is not ascertained from what natural object this letter derives its name. Shaw considers it not improbable that it was thus named, from its being a soft way of expressing b; and that p was not in the Gaelic previous to our knowledge of the Latin. It is certain that, like the labial letters of all languages, these letters were once used indiscriminately; for pian and bian, pain, béist and péist, beast, &c., are found in ancient manuscripts.

There are three kinds of bagpipes, the Highland, the Irish, and the Scottish. These instruments differ essentially in their tone and compass of sound; but they have this circumstance in common, that the air blown into them, and which gives them utterance, is collected into a bag, and is dislodged by the pressure of the performer's arm. Of these, the Highland pipe is, beyond comparison, the most magnificent. It consists of a large bag, to which is attached a pipe for the inflation of it; a chanter which furnishes the tenor part of the music; and three drones which sound a loud swelling bass. The sound of the drones is monotonous, and is in unison with the lowest note, save one, on the chanter. When the large drone is affixed, the noise is exceedingly loud, and well qualified for martial purposes. This instrument, as may be supposed, requires prodigious exertion of the lungs; and the piper is accordingly obliged to stand or walk when he plays on it. The compass of the bagpipe is not great. It has but nine notes in all, which are not capable of any variation by flats or sharps; so that they are natural. It is tuned by lengthening or shortening the drone, until the note desired is sounded.

The Gael are not to be accounted the inventors of this noble instrument, though they have improved upon it in such a degree as to render its music of a most martial character, and exclusively their own. The Norwegians had their sack-pipe from time immemorial; yet it has been asserted that they borrowed it from the Caledonians. The Greeks had their ἀγκυλις, or αγκυλις, an instrument composed of an inflated bag, a chanter, and two drones. The peasants of Italy had, and still have, their piva and cornunasa, formed on the model of the ἀγκυλις. Nero, who was an accomplished musician, is said to have greatly improved this instrument. There is still to be seen at Rome a sculpture, in basso-relievo, of the highest antiquity—a bagpiper, playing on his instrument like a Highlander.

Aristides Quintilianus observes, that the bagpipes were used among the Caledonians in the very early ages; yet the fragments of ancient Gaelic poetry which have come down to us make no mention of them; so if they existed in those times, they must have been in a very rude and unimproved condition. The clarsach and the crut were the instruments of note among the old Gael; and these continued in vogue so long as their government was regular and their manners civilized. But when, in the course of time, dismemberment and distraction arose among them; when chieftainry, clanship, rivalry, and feud, usurped the place of law, subordination, and regular warfare, attention was turned to the bagpipe, which was introduced and speedily improved upon. It was soon found to be a most suitable instrument for spreading alarms, for collecting the clans with necessary speed, and for every exigency that might occur in the altered condition of their society. The bagpipe has been, for centuries past, the instrument of national music among the Gael; and in the Isle of Skye there was a college founded by the McLeans and the McDonalds, whither every performer who aspired to eminence resorted for instruction. The bagpipe is fast on the decline; and before the lapse of two centuries, it is likely that it shall, in its turn, give way to the long-neglected harp.

Ro', (for roimh), prep. and adv. Before; first.

Ro', (for troimh.) Through. Ghluais geur na cruaidhe ro' cheann, the weapon's edge passed through his head.—Oss. Tem.

Ro, adv. (Ir. id.) Very; much; too much; exceeding. When this adverb precedes an adjective, it communicates to it the same degree of comparison which very does to a noun in English; and, moreover, it throws it into the aspirated form, except it begins with l, n, or r; as, buan, lasting; ro buuan, very lasting; cairdeil, friendly; ro chàirdeil, very friendly; daor, dear; ro dhaor, very dear; fearail, manly; ro fhearail, very manly; geur, sharp; ro gheur, very sharp; mall, slow; ro mhall, very slow; prìseil, precious; ro phrìseil, very precious; searbh, bitter; ro shearbh, very bitter; taitneach, pleasant; ro thaitneach, very pleasant. When the letter s, in the beginning of an adjective, is immediately followed by any consonant, except l, r, n, there is no aspiration. Thus we say, ro sbairneil, ro seilmeil, ro sgairteil, ro smiorail, ro spòrsail, ro stuama; but we never say, ro sleamhuinn, ro snitheach, ro sradach, instead of ro shleamhuinn, ro shnithreach, ro shradach. L or n, at the beginning of adjectives which are preceded by ro, are pronounced much the same as in English; but when they are preceded by s, they have a sound to which there is none similar in the English or Scottish languages. Almost in every case where we wish to express a superlative degree, ro may be used, observing the directions just given.

Ro-AIRE, s. f. Great care; great diligence. A toirt an ro-aire, taking great care, looking diligently.—Stew. Heb. Thoir an ro-aire air, take great care of him or it.

- Olaus Wormius, whose erudition cannot be questioned, has an elaborate dissertation on the origin of the Runæ, in the beginning of his work on Runic literature. It would have shortened or facilitated his inquiries had he known, or rather had it occurred to him, that in the Gaelic, Irish, and Armoric dialects of the Celtic, rùn signifies a secret or mystery. Indeed, the Cimbric term runa, which signifies hieroglyphics, seems to be quite explanatory of Runæ, characters which were but a mysterious and hieroglyphical mode of writing used by the priests of the ancient Goths. The Runic hieroglyphics are, perhaps, the secreta literarum mentioned by Tacitus de Mor. Germ. When the Germans afterwards learned the use of letters they, very naturally, called their alphabet Runæ. See Gloss. Goth. ad Voc. Runa.

S.

S, s, (suil and sail, the willow.) The sixteenth letter of the Gaelic alphabet. It has two sounds: (1.) It sounds like sh in sheet, when it is preceded or followed by e or i, whether immediately or with a lingual intervening; as, bris, break; sir, seek; fàisg, squeeze; sion, a blast. (2.) In every other situation it sounds like s in salt, sack; as, sac, a sack; sona, happy; srac, tear; cas or cos, a foot. But when s is immediately followed by h, there is only an aspirated articulation heard; as, a shùil, (pron. a hùil), his eye; shuidh, (pron. lui), sat. Lastly, sh are altogether quiescent when they are followed by either of the liquids l, n; as, shleuchd, worshipping; shnámh, swarm. S, when preceded by the letter t with a hyphen (t-), is quiescent; as, san t-sabhal, in the barn; an t-sluaigh, of the people.

S', (for so), demonstrative pron. This. Am baile s', this town.

'S, (for is), def. v. Am, art, is, are.

'S, (for agus.) And.

The following lines, of inimitable beauty, exemplify the contracted forms of the preceding words s and agus:

Ach 's léir leat, a sholuis an là,
Taibhse Thralthail na cheo glas,
Tra dh' éirias e 'd dhearsa tra nòin,
'S a bhios ceo air binnein nan sleibhte.
'S tainneach le d' dhearsa leabhadh nan treun
'S ceò éide nan laoch gàbhaidh:
'S tric thu blà air leabaidh Threimhhoir.
'S ag éiridh air lio Thralthuil.—Oss. Trathal.

Thou dost behold, O light of day,
The ghost of Thralthail in his misty shroud,
When it rises in thy noontide beam,
And when the mist is on the mountain tops,
Pleasant to thy rays are the graves of heroes,
And the cloudy mantle of warriors fierce.
Often art thou warm on the bed of Trenmor,
And rising on Thralthail's tomb.

SEONADH, s. m.

According to Martin, Seonadh is the name of a water-spirit, which the inhabitants of Lewis used to propitiate by a cup of ale, in the following manner:—The inhabitants of the island came to the church of St. Mulway, each man carrying his provisions. Every family gave a poek of malt, and the whole was brewed into ale. One of their number was chosen to wade into the sea up to the middle, carrying in his hand a cup filled with ale. When he reached a proper depth, he stood still and cried aloud: "Seonadh! I give thee this cup of ale, hoping that thou wilt be so good as to send us plenty of sea-ware for enriching our ground, during the coming year." He then threw the ale into the sea. This ceremony was performed in the night-time. On his coming to land, they all repaired to church, where there was a candle burning on the altar. There they stood still for a time, when, on a signal given, the candle was put out, and straightway they adjourned to the fields, where the night was spent merrily over the ale. Next morning they returned to their respective homes, in the belief that they had insured a plentiful crop for the next season.

SGIATHANACH, aich, s. m. A native of the Isle of Skye.

SGIATHANACH, a. Winged; belonging to Skye; of Skye. An t-eilean Sgiathanach, the Isle of Skye; the winged island.

The name of this island has given room to much ingenious conjecture. Mr. Toland, in his History of the Druids, supported by his very ingenious editor, Mr. Huddleston, as well as by Dr. Smith of Campbelltown, are disposed to trace the name to a remote antiquity, and will have it that the island was so called, from its containing the famous winged temple of Apollo, which he is said to have had among the Hyperboreans. Sgiath is a pure Celtic term, signifying wing. In support of the conjecture of these eminent antiquarians, it has been justly observed, that ὑπερβόρειοι, Hyperboreans, was a name given to the islanders or Hebridiens by the ancient mariners, from their being so far north from the Gades or the Straits of Gibraltar. Diodorus Siculus, too, in describing the Hyperboreans of the isles (not those of the Continent who inhabited the northern parts of Europe from Scythia, or Tartary and Russia, westward to Scandinavia, or Sweden and Norway inclusive), says, that "of all the other deities they worshipped Apollo the most"—Τὸν Ἀπὸλλωνα μάλιστα τῶν ἄλλων θεῶν παρ' αὐτοῖς τιμᾶσθαι.—Lib. ii. cap. 130. Unquestionably this is a proof that the Hyperboreans (the Boireadhaich) did worship Apollo; and the striking resemblance of the Celtic grían, sun, and Grannus, one of the names of that divinity, may be mentioned as affording additional corroboration. Respecting the winged Hyperborean temple, there are the ruins of a spacious edifice still shewn in the Isle of Skye, which is supposed to be the remains of the building in question. It cannot be doubted that such a building did exist. Eratosthenes, already mentioned, one of the most learned chronologers, and one of the most accurate geographers of his time, speaking of Apollo's arrow, with which he slew the Cyclops, and in honour of which one of the northern constellations (saighead, sagitta), has been named, says of the arrow, ἐκφύλα δὲ αὐτοῦ ἐν ὤρει βαλὼν ἐν αὐτῇ ὁ ναὸς ὁ πτερινός, He hid it among the Hyperboreans, where there is a winged temple. But πτερινός here presents a little barrier; as ναὸς πτερινός may be either a winged temple or a temple made of wings; πτερινός being translatable either way. This difficulty Mr. Toland flies over cleverly, and says, if he (Eratosthenes) meant the former, the ruins correspond with the epithet πτερινός; if the latter, where can feathers be found in such abundance and variety as among the western islands, where many of the inhabitants pay their rent with them, and have profit besides?

Others will have it, that the island received its name from the Norwegians, after their conquest of it and the neighbouring isles; and that it signifies the cloudy island, from the Norse skia, a cloud. The least learned opinion on this subject is the most probable; which is, that the isle was so called from its northern promontories, Watermess and Toterness, which shoot out into the sea, and exhibit to mariners the appearance of wings.

SITHICH, v. a. and n., from sith. (Ir. id.) Calm, pacify, assuage, reconcile—(Stew. Num. ref.); grow calm, grow pacified, grow reconciled.

SITHICH, s. m. A fairy; an elf. N. pl. sithrichean. This word seems to be derived from sith, and literally means a peacemaker.

The sithich is the most active sprite of Highland mythology. It is a dexterous child-stealer, and is particularly intrusive on women in travail. At births many covert and cunning ceremonies are still used to baffle the fairy's power, otherwise the new-born infant would be taken off to Fairyland, and a withered brat laid in its stead. They are wantonly mischievous, and have weapons peculiar to themselves, which operate no good to those at whom they are shot. A clergyman of the kirk, who wrote concerning Fairyland about the end of the seventeenth century, says of these weapons, that "they are solid earthly bodies, nothing of iron, but much of stone, like to a yellow soft flint spar, shaped like a barbed arrow-head, but thung like a dart with great force." This belief, as well as most Highland superstitions, are traceable to the early ages of the British Druids, on whose practices they are founded.

T.

T, t, (tin.) The seventeenth letter of the Gaelic alphabet. T, not aspirated, has two sounds: (1.) Nearly like t in town; or exactly like t in the Italian, tocco, or in the French, toucher. (2.) A slender sound, like ch in check; as, tighiun, coming; sailte, salted. When aspirated, it sounds like h in him; as, thainig, came. It is silent in the middle of words, in the end of long syllables, in some tenses of certain verbs irregular, and in thu and thusa; as, maithas, goodness; maoth, gentle; an d' thainig thu? art thou come?

T- is placed between the def. art. and the nom. sing. mas. of most nouns beginning with a vowel. Is mi féin an t-aon-aran truagh, a poor solitary being am I.—Oss. Taura. An t-eug a strìgh ris, death struggling with him.—Id.

T- is also inserted between the def. art. and any noun beginning with s followed by a vowel or a liquid. The divination by the taghairm was once a noted superstition among the Gael, and in the northern parts of the Lowlands of Scotland. When any important question concerning futurity arose, and of which a solution was, by all means, desirable, some shrewder person than his neighbours was pitched upon, to perform the part of a prophet. This person was wrapped in the warm smoking hide of a newly-stain ox or cow, commonly an ox, and laid at full length in the wildest recess of some lonely waterfall. The question was then put to him, and the oracle was left in solitude to consider it. Here he lay for some hours with his cloak of knowledge around him, and over his head, no doubt, to see the better into futurity; deafened by the incessant roaring of the torrent; every sense assailed; his body steaming; his fancy was in ferment; and whatever notion had found its way into his mind from so many sources of prophecy, it was firmly believed to have been communicated by invisible beings who were supposed to haunt such solitudes.

TAIBHSEAR, cir, s. m. A seer, or one gifted with the second sight. N. pl. taibhsearan.

TAIBHSEARACHD, s. f. (from taibhse.) The second sight, or the faculty of seeing otherwise invisible objects.

I consider that some account of the Highland seers, and of their predictions, will not here be misplaced nor unacceptable.

At the sight of a vision of this kind, Dr. Martin observes, the eyelids of the gifted person were erected, and the eyes continued staring till the vision disappeared. If an object is seen in the morning, it will be accomplished in the afternoon; if at noon, on that very day; if in the evening, that very night; and if after candles are lit, on that night for certain. If a shroud is seen about a person, it foretells approaching death; and the time of it is more or less distant, according to the height at which the shroud is observed on the body. If it be seen about the middle, death is not expected within a twelvemonth; if as high as the head, it is not many hours distant. To see a spark of fire falling on one's arm, foretells that a dead child shall be seen in the arms of that person. To see a chair empty at the time a person sits in it, is a sure sign of approaching death to that person. Seers did not observe supernatural appearances at the same time, though they might happen to be in the same apartment; but when one of them saw a vision, touched any number of his brethren, they all saw it as well as the first.

Having said this much of seers, and of the second sight, it may be amusing to many, to know how far the prophecies and the fulfilments agreed. For this purpose I select an instance or two, recorded by an English nobleman in the seventeenth century, who, previous to his going to the Highlands, was one of the sturdiest unbelievers in the second sight.

"SIR,—I heard very much, and believed very little, of the second sight; yet its being assumed by several of great veracity, I was induced to make inquiry after it, in the year 1652, being confined to abide in the North of Scotland, by the English usurpers. * * *

"* * * I was travelling in the Highlands, and a good number of servants with me, as is usual there. One of them going a little before me, entering into a house where I was to stay all night, and going hastily to the door, he suddenly stepped back with a screech, and did fall by a stone which bit his foot. I asked what the matter was, for he seemed to be very much frightened. He told me very seriously that I should not lodge in that house, because shortly a dead coffin would be carried out of it, for many were carrying of it when he was heard to cry. I neglecting his words, and staying there, he said to the other servants he was sorry for it, and that surely what he saw would come to pass. Tho' no sick person was then there, yet the landlord died of an apoplectic fit before I left the house. * * *

"I shall trouble you with but one more which I thought the most remarkable of any that occurred to me. In January 1652, Lieut. Col. Alex. Munro, and I, were in the house of one Wm. McLeod, of Feriulea, in the county of Ross. He, the landlord, and I, were sitting on three chairs near the fire; and in the corner of the great chimney there were two islanders, who were that very night come to the house, and were related to the landlord. While the one of them was talking to Munro, I perceived the other to look oddly toward me. From his look, and his being an islander, I conjectured him a seer, and asked him what he staired at? He answered me by desiring me to rise from the chair, for it was an unlucky one. I asked him why? He answered, because there is a dead man in the chair next to me. Well, said I, if he be in the next chair to me, I may keep mine own. But what is the likeness of the man? He said he was a tall man with a long grey coat, booted, and one of his legs hanging over the arm of the chair, and his head hanging dead on the other side, and his arm backward, as if it was broken. There were some English troops then quartered near that place, and there being at that time a great frost after a thaw, the country was covered all over with yce. Four or five of the English ryding by this house some two hours after the vision, while we were sitting by the fire, we heard a great noise, which proved to be those troopers, with the help of other servants, carrying in one of their number, who had a very mischievous fall, and had his arm broke; and falling frequently in swooning fits, they brought him into the hall, and set him on the verie chair, and in the verie posture that the seer prophecied. But the man did not die, though he recovered with great difficulty.

"Among the accounts given me by Sir Norman McLeod, there was one worthy of special notice, which was thus:—There was a gentleman in the isle of Harris, who was always seen by the seers with an arrow in his thigh. Such in the isle who thought these prognostications infallible, did not doubt but he would be shot in the thigh before he died. Sir Norman told me that he heard it the subject of their discourse for many years. At last he died without any such accident. Sir Norman was at his burial at St. Clement's Church in the Harris. At the same time the corpse of another gentleman was brought to be buried in the verie same church. The friends on either side came to debate who should first enter the church, and in a trice from words they came to blows. One of the number, who was armed with a bow and arrows, let one fly among them. (Now everie familie in that isle have their burial place in the church in stone chests, and the bodies are carried in open biers to the burial place.) Sir Norman having appeased the tumult, one of the arrows was found shot in the dead man's thigh. To this Sir Norman was a witness.

"These are matters of fact which, I assure you, are truly related."—Succinct Account of my Lord Turbott's Relations, in a Letter to the Hon. Robert Boyle, Esquire, of the Predictions made by Seers, whereof himself was Ear and Eye-witness.

I have seen a work on the second sight, by one who styles himself 'Theophilus Insulanus,' wherein is recorded a great variety of cases where these visions were exactly fulfilled, and in so satisfactory a way, that many of the Highland clergy became believers in the existence of this faculty. Either Dr. Beattie must not have been aware of this circumstance, or he threw out a galling sarcasm when he said that none but the most ignorant pretended to be gifted with the second sight.

These cases of shadowy prediction will enable the reader to balance the conflicting opinions entertained on the curious subject of the second sight; the one by Dr. Beattie of Aberdeen, and the other by the celebrated Dr. Samuel Johnson. The former ascribes this pretended faculty wholly to the influence of physical causes on superstitious and un instructed minds. He thinks that long tracts of mountainous deserts, covered with dark heath, and often obscured by misty weather, narrow valleys, thinly inhabited, and bounded by precipices resounding with the fall of torrents, the mournful dashing of waves along the friths and lakes that intersect the country, the grotesque and ghastly appearance of such a landscape by the light of the moon, must diffuse a gloom over the fancy, which may be compatible enough with occasional and social merriment, but cannot fail to tincture the thoughts of a native in the hour of silence and solitude: that it is not wonderful if persons of a lively imagination, immured in deep solitude, and surrounded with the stupendous scenery of clouds, precipices, and torrents, should dream (even when they think themselves awake) of those few striking ideas, with which their lonely lives are diversified, of corpses, funeral processions, and other subjects of terror; or of marriages, and the arrival of strangers, and such like matters of more agreeable curiosity: that none but ignorant people pretend to be gifted in this way, and that in them it may be nothing more, perhaps, than short fits of sudden sleep or drowsiness, attended with lively dreams, and arising from bodily disorder, the effect of idleness, low spirits, or a gloomy imagination. Nor is it extraordinary, he observes, that one should have the appearance of being awake, and should even think one's self so, during those fits of dozing; that they should come on suddenly, and while one is engaged in some business. The same thing happens to persons much fatigued, or long kept awake, who frequently fall asleep for a moment, or for a long space, while they are standing, or walking, or riding on horse-back: add but a lively dream to this slumber, and (which is the frequent effect of disease) take away the consciousness of having been asleep, and a superstitious man may easily mistake his dream for a waking vision. Beattie disbelieves the prophetic nature of the second sight; and does not think it analogous to the operations of Providence, nor to the course of nature, that the Deity should work a miracle in order to give intimation of the frivolous matters which were commonly predicted by seers; and that these intimations should be given for no end, and to those persons only who are idle and solitary, who speak Gaelic, or who live among mountains and deserts.

To these objections it has been powerfully replied by Dr. Johnson, that by presuming to determine what is fit, and what is beneficial, they presuppose more knowledge of the universal system than man has hitherto attained; and therefore depend upon principles too complicated and extensive for our comprehension, and that there can be no security in the consequence when the premises are not understood: that the second sight is only wonderful because it is rare, for, considered in itself, it involves no more difficulty than dreams, or perhaps the regular exercise of the cogitative faculty: that a general opinion of communicative impulses, or visionary representations, has prevailed in all ages and nations: that particular instances have been given with such evidence as neither Bacon nor Bayle have been able to resist; that sudden impressions, which the event has verified, have been felt by more than own or publish them; that the second sight of the Hebrides implies only the local frequency of a power which is no where totally unknown; and that where we are unable to decide by antecedent reason, we must be content to yield to the force of testimony. By pretension to second sight, no profit was ever sought or gained. It is an involuntary affection, in which neither hope nor fear are known to have any part. Those who profess to feel it do not boast of it as a privilege, nor are considered by others as advantageously distinguished. They have no temptation to feign, and their hearers have no motives to encourage the imposture.

TÀN, tain, s. m. A country; a territory; ground, land, earth. Ir. id. Gr. τανν, land. Madag. taue. Chin. tien. Malay, tana.

Tan, land, is not much in use among the Gael. It is seen, however, in all names of countries ending in tania; as Britannia, Aquitania, Lusitania. Tan, signifying earth or ground, gave the name Titans (Τῑ-ἄν), dwellers in the earth, to those people of antiquity who, in preference to the open air, lived in the subterranean caverns in which Europe once abounded. The opposition made by the Italian Titans, descendants of Hellen, son of Deucalion, to the northern invaders, whose generals took the name of gods, gave rise to the fabled war between the gods and the giants. Ti-tans, as may be seen, is a pure Celtic name, meaning literally an earth-being, or subterraneous being; they were also called Gigantes, from γῑγῑς, another Celtic term (Cé-gin, earth-born), in Greek characters.

Malcolm has the following observations on the word ti. "In St. Kilda," he says, "ti means great. The old name of Hispaniola is Hayti. Now Ti is an island; as, I cholum chille, Icolmkil. A Southron would pronounce i ay or at, and ti, great, would be ayti, or the great island. Among the Caribs, ti means a great person; and among the Gael, Dia is God. The striking resemblance between many West Indian, American, and Celtic terms, may be seen under AN, AB, and elsewhere throughout this work.

Ti, s. m. (Ir. id.) Intention, design, purpose. Bha 'thi air mise a sgrìos, his design was to slay me.—Orr.

TIGHEAN, ein, s. m. A bag or satchel.

TIGHEAN, n. pl. of tigh.

TIGHEARN, arna, s. m. A lord; a baronet; a name given to any proprietor, however insignificant.

Tighearn is always written by the Gael with gh; and I do not think it advisable to deviate in this instance from the common orthography, though I am persuaded that the Irish tiarna is a more correct form of the word. It is evidently the same with terna of the Chaldaic, tyrannos of the Greek, tyrannus of the Latin, and tyern of the Welch and Armoric. This being the case, the gh seems to have been introduced into this word and its derivatives by the ancient rehearsers of Gaelic poetry, or by Gaelic poets themselves, in order to make up three syllables. A similar epenthesis occurs in the first verse of the Iliad.

TIGHEARNACHD, s. f. Lordship.

TIGHEARNAIL, a. (tighearn-amhuil.) W. teyrnawl. Lordly, haughty; domineering.
